One might imagine that the hares of Trigon would be overwhelmed by the sheer number of mice but, as we've discussed, the hares don't share the same vast hunger for mice as their more timid cousins. They're quite happy to dance around the woodlands nibbling on snails and leaves, not that they're entirely averse to eating mice but they tend to kill them with ease. Their brains, in comparison to the less vigilant mice, are much more structured. In the long term, this means the mice find it harder to outwit the hares, but in the short term it means that if a hare is lucky enough to catch a mouse, it can usually kill it within seconds. The same rules seem to apply to most mammals, even those who aren't particularly vigilant or organised. Pigs, for instance, have been seen to eat anything that's fallen in their path. If you've ever seen a dog playfully roll in the road, you may have spotted one of them snatching up a tasty morsel. Dogs are much more capable of hunting than most people might imagine and, when it comes to catching prey, they seem to be perfectly capable of picking up almost anything they find. With their keen eyesight and smell they can usually catch any kind of prey that falls into their path, whether it's a small rodent or large dinosaur. The one thing that seems to vary, however, is whether the prey needs to be alive to be caught or not. If the prey is dead, some species, such as chimpanzees, can eat it, but generally they prefer to bite it with their teeth, rip out chunks of flesh and eat it that way. If the prey is alive, they'll usually either eat it or, if the hunt is particularly violent, eat it as well. Dolphins are extremely successful at catching their prey; a dolphin can capture a fish or squid in the blink of an eye. However, even though the fish or squid are still alive, they'll usually choose not to eat it. They'll either roll it over, pull it apart or start eating it around the outside. Any animal can catch their prey whether they're alive or not, but the rules are a little different. As we've discussed, a hunt is generally successful if the animal that's hunting is more organised and vigilant than its prey. Although a kill might seem to be an
