A nanoscale model based on thiolate-protected gold nanoclusters (nAu3(S-)) was developed for the selective and sensitive detection of cysteine, homocysteine and glutathione. A thiolate was used as the capping agent to tune the size, stability and optical properties of nAu3(S-). The nanoparticles show very high selectivity toward cysteine, homocysteine and glutathione (in the order of homocysteine > glutathione > cysteine), as well as excellent stability. Moreover, the nAu3(S-)-based nanoparticles display excellent selective response toward cysteine, homocysteine and glutathione under physiological conditions. The proposed nAu3(S-) is, thus, a simple but effective platform for the selective and sensitive detection of cysteine, homocysteine and glutathione in biological fluids, which has promising application for the detection of cysteine in biological systems.On Friday morning, during a debate about the future of the Affordable Care Act, President Trump said of Obamacare, “We’ll see what happens. It’s going to be repealed.” But that statement leaves open some questions. If “we” — meaning all people in the United States — are going to pay higher premiums as a result of the repeal of the ACA, how will all the policyholders be affected equally? And who will be to blame for the rising premiums? What happens if an insurer won’t play ball? Most important, how is the Trump Administration going to pay for his promise to
