A: It is normal for professional video editors to not use transitions in their work, and any editor worth their salt will have a good reason for that. That may not make any sense at first, but if you think about it, you'll see that you wouldn't want to interrupt an artistic work flow with a default video transition. You might need transitions to create a perfect flow. That's why most pro editors use at least some transitions. Alternative Metalwork Alternative metalwork is a performance and fine art metalwork medium. The medium was conceived by Miles Bitterman in 1993. Miles Bitterman Miles Bitterman was born in New York, United States, on June 30, 1971. Bitterman is a self-taught metalworker. His career began when he was a student in the Art Institute of Chicago where he received his BFA in Drawing, Painting, and Printmaking in 1994. He was heavily influenced by the style of American Northwest Native American art, and his first metalwork was inspired by Native American sacred artifacts. Miles also discovered an interest in the traditional method of hand-casting and shaping metal into his own works. He has been working in metal since 1993 and has exhibited his work in over fifty galleries and museums including the Art Institute of Chicago, Chicago Cultural Center, Womens Art Coalition Gallery, Field Gallery, The List Gallery, and the Hammer Museum, among others. Miles Bitterman currently resides in New York City, United States. Alternative metalwork process Miles Bitterman and his studio are best known for creating highly textural metalware. This unique textural aesthetic is achieved through a combination of traditional casting methods, using mostly found materials, as well as their own proprietary process of making products. Traditional casting methods are: hand casting, binder casting and extrusion. Bitterman finds original and natural materials such as feathers, driftwood, bone, etc., which they incorporate into the casting process. The handmade process includes: hand-casting, binder casting, and extrusion. A combination of these three processes creates different textural pieces. Bitterman is not only known for his textural pieces, but also his original designs. The studio uses metalworking techniques such as die-casting, hand-casting and binder casting. They also use traditional casting processes that are prevalent throughout the world. These processes allow for the creation of unique designs and products
